The Origins of Spy Thanksgiving

The origins of Spy Thanksgiving can be traced back to the early days of the Cold War. In the 1950s, the United States was engaged in a fierce rivalry with the Soviet Union, and espionage was a critical tool in this conflict.

American spies were operating in all corners of the globe, and they needed a way to communicate with each other without being detected. They came up with the idea of using a secret code, which they would hide in plain sight.

The spies chose Thanksgiving as the perfect day to exchange messages, as it was a holiday when people would be gathering with family and friends. They would use innocent-looking items, such as a turkey leg or a piece of pumpkin pie, to conceal their coded messages.

The Hidden Traditions of Spy Thanksgiving

Over the years, Spy Thanksgiving has evolved into a unique holiday with its own set of traditions. Spies from all over the world come together to celebrate this special day, and they often engage in friendly competitions to see who can hide the most creative messages.

One of the most popular traditions is the "turkey drop." This involves hiding a message inside a cooked turkey and then delivering it to a designated recipient. The recipient must then find the message and decode it.

Another tradition is the "pumpkin pie puzzle." This involves creating a pumpkin pie with a hidden message baked into the crust. The recipient must then eat the pie and figure out the message.
